

I want to voice my opinion on allowing banks the right to bypass the No-Call list and contact their previous customers. The purpose of the No-Call list is to prevent companies from constantly invading your home through the phone line. Banks are no different from any other company. The fact that they have more money behind them may give them a feeling of superiority, but that attitude is flawed. If a customer stops using a particular business, they have made a decision to do so for a specific reason. They don't want that company to then call them at home. This is telephone stalking! If I decided to stop shopping at Walmart or Target, I would be very angry if the store then called me to ask why I didn't want to shop with them anymore. Once you cut ties, you can't give the company legal super glue to stay in touch with you. That's harassment! It's wrong to allow a company legal rights to this inappropriate and rude behavior. If the company lost your business - tough luck! Get a life! Maybe they should focus on improving their business practices and customer service instead. J. Moline
